

A Reversible Game.

The sketching party has been one of the most popular amusements for an informal gathering for several seasons, and there is certainly a no more enjoyable and often laughable game. The primary plan is to have blank cards and the name of a popular song written on one side, and the guest is asked to draw a picture illustrating the song. There are a great many who are decidedly clever with their pencils, and the originality displayed is often really remarkable. At a small party a few days ago there was a sketching, but instead of the name of the song being given each one was asked to draw a picture illustrating a song, and then the cards were passed, and the others were obliged to guess the name. The members of the party were very bright young women, and the pictures which they presented for the inspection of the others were wonderful to behold, and still more wonderful to guess. One young woman drew a cat on one side of the card and a dog at the other, and under the first she wrote "In It," and under the other "Not in It." The song was "Daddy Won't Buy Me a Bowwow."

Hallowe'en.

The quaint old festival of All Hallowe'en comes again this week, and Tuesday evening the usual customs will be observed in this city, though to no great extent. The social quiet will be broken with a few gatherings, but nearly everyone will be entirely informal. The spooks, of course, will fill their part of the programme, and the season has furnished enough nuts and apples to seal the fate of all the young people, and old they wait them. The frosts have opened the chestnuts and the gates still hang on hinges, and the pickets are yet put on with straight hammers, so that all things considered, everything seems propitious for a proper celebration of the ghost evening. There are men for the maidens, and the usual rumors of engagements will follow the last night of October.

Sleeves.

At a church wedding, which of course was some time ago, there was a very large number of invitations and a general acceptance. The pews were crowded, and as there were many waiting to get in every bit of space was filled before the bride made her appearance. A man was heard to say, "When they issued the invitations to this wedding they must have forgotten to make any allowance for the women's sleeves." It will be well for those who expect to have a church wedding in the future to consider the prevailing fashion before making a list of those to be invited, for the size of skirts and sleeves make some difference in space.

Mysterious invitations have been issued, without the name of a host or hostess, to be given at the Country Club All Hallowe'en evening. There are queer designs on the cards and a rendezvous appointed. As everyone who received an invitation is making preparations to go, the festivities are to be patronized and the pleasure which curiosity arouses is in the superlative.

The first meeting of the Senior Club of the Girls' Classical School was held Friday afternoon with Miss Lulu Spann, on North Delaware street. The entertainment was a sketching party, and the members drew pictures illustrating popular songs, and then the pictures were named. The officers of the club are: President, Miss Ethel Fletcher; vice president, Miss Lulu Spann; secretary, Miss Myla Coburn, and treasurer, Miss Helen Holman.

On Friday afternoon the German Literary Club held its meeting with Mrs. Dr. Calvin Fletcher. The programme was changed from one purely German one partially so, as an essay in German on Goethe's "Elective Affinities," by Mrs. Henry Kahn, was followed by one in English, on the same subject, by Miss Elizabeth Nicholson. The different views taken by the two ladies brought about much varied thought and opinion, and the discussion was free and animated. Each member brought in a guest, and in honor of the latter rules as to German speaking were suspended.

The senior class of the Indianapolis high school gave a reception in the hall of the high school yesterday afternoon. Nearly one hundred and twenty were present. Musical selections consisting of a solo by Mr. Benton, a solo by Miss Maud Lucas, a piano solo by Miss Aufderheide, and many others were well received, and the members of the class rendered excellent string music. Lemonade and cake were on one corner of the room. The favors consisted of gilded acorns attached to blue and red ribbons. The reception was a new feature and was considered a great success.
